"Arizona Mahoney"
Another one of those real old-fashioned Zane Grey Westerns will be shown at the Kendrick Theatre this Friday and Saturday nights. When "Arizona Mahoney," with shootin' Joe Cook at the trigger. There is a lot of comedy, as well as shooting, and a strong love story runs throughout the picture. Into the scene rides "Arizona" and his assistant, Phil, at the head of a broken-down carnival. They come upon a stage coach that had just been robbed. The lady in distress, of course, is rescued and promptly falls in love, after which the many complications start. There is another feature film, "Lady Be Careful," a knockout comedy, with Lew Ayres and Mary Carlyle in the leading roles. Other features will also be shown during the evening.

LATAH COUNTY CREATED BY ACT OF CONGRESS

The following article, written for the Lewiston Tribune by C. E. Arney, special correspondent, will be of interest to many old-timers of this section and which we here reprint: It has been my privilege and pleasure to attend the last territorial legislative assembly in Idaho and all but two of the state sessions since statehood, those two while I was with Senator Fred Dubois as his secretary in Washington.

Of all legislation I have observed that which was utterly steeped in vitrol was the county seat fights; i.e., the struggle for new counties with some hamlet, village or town aspiring to take territory from some one or more adjoining counties and establish, in their treasured municipality, a seat of county government. I do not now remember any such creation without a hard scrap on the part of the counties to be deprived of territory, consequent taxable wealth and voters. In the light of modern invention and especially the development of the make-and-break engine and the surfacing of the highways, necessities which had legitimate claim for seats of county government within close reach of each other, had much more claim for many seats of county government than now. It was originally thought that a reasonable drive of a team drawing a buckboard 25 or 30 miles, was about the reasonable distance for county courthouses, for such a drive required about eight or ten hours.

Today, with a "flivver," one can easily drive to and through 10 to 12 county seats in a day. This with telephone communication, added telegraphic and train facilities and the airplane, reduce distance and the old argument for so many county seats to the border of ridicule.

Some ten years ago the Idaho legislature passed a law permitting counties to hold elections and test public opinion on the issue of merging counties as an economic measure. It looked like a businesslike move until the lawyers and the officeholders awoke to the occasion and placed an anesthetic to the proposal which made it utterly inoperative, that was a two-thirds vote on the plebescite.

The bitterest struggles for and against new creations of counties in my Idaho observations were between Canyon and Ada and the dismemberment of old Alturas, when many gunmen occupied the council chamber and George P. Wheeler of Bingham presided over the lower house with a six-shooter rather than the gavel. But away before my day in the west was the tense struggle of Nez Perce to retain her territory unmolested against the vigorous and ever-insistence of Moscow for the creation of Latah county. Believe it or not, this struggle started 65 years ago, or in 1872, when the postoffice at Lieualen, a mile east of the present business center of Moscow, was removed to that new village and one V. Craig was named as the first postmaster.

Soon mail routes were established, first by pony express riders—John Denny being recorded as the first mail carrier—and later by stages, the recently departed Felix Warren being one of four or five first stage drivers to carry mail and express from Moscow to Lewiston, Genesee, Farmington and other then-distant centers of population. All were striving for people and industries, for competition for trade and population and capital investments was sharp and at times—as in the county seat struggle for Moscow—most bitter. At times in the winter when ferries could not make the streams the mail bags across the Clearwater river were conveyed by pulleys attached to the cables and drawn over and back by the double rope process.

The initial legislative endeavor to encroach on old Nez Perce for area for another county to the north came in the second session of the territorial legislature held in Lewiston in 1864 when a bill passed both houses and was signed by the governor creating a county of the territory north of the Clearwater river and west of Shoshone county to be named "LahToh," with Coeur d'Alene as the county seat. There was then no Moscow.

For some reason which history cloaks, this county was never organized, although the territorial governor did name three county commissioners. Legislative sessions in these early territorial days were held annually. In the fourth session, held in Boise in December, 1866, Kootenai county was created with boundary lines the same as those previously provided for "LahToh" county. The contention grew in bitterness with the years and with the growth and development of both Lewiston and Moscow, and the incoming of strong men from the east and middle west, joining with vigor in the desire for supremacy. Nez Perce evidently held the high hand until a further legislative outbreak occurred in the session of 1882. W. S. Taylor was in the territorial council and S. W. Toner in the house. These two were devotees of the fortunes of a proposed Latah county (the spelling had been modified by that time to conform to the present "Latah," but during the pendency of this measure it was discovered that the congress had placed a congressional inhibition on the further creation of new counties. The joy of the Nez Perce crowd was unbounded, but not for long, for the resourceful Moscow county-seat advocates proceeded and passed a bill permitting the voters to go to the polls at a not far distant date—to be fixed by gubernatorial proclamation—and vote "yes" or "no" on the creation of Latah county with Moscow as the seat of government. This plebescite was held in June, 1883, and the "ayes" received 642 votes to the "nays" 922. Then there was bad blood between Moscow and Lewiston. But the fight continued.

In 1887, with Fred Dubois as the delegate in congress, the territory, of course, having no representation in the senate, Dubois introduced a bill for the creation of Latah county. Senator Mitchell of Oregon piloted the bill through the senate after Dubois had passed it through the house, the measure providing that the congress should name three commissioners in whom power should be vested to name the rest of the county officers. Charles Moore of Moscow represented the Moscow contingent favoring the enactment at the national capital while James W. Reid, brilliant Lewiston attorney and a former member in congress from a Virginia district, looked after the opposition desired by the Nez Perce opponents. The act, in a class of its own, being the only county in the United States before or since created by act of congress, was signed by President Grover Cleveland on May 14, 1888. Two weeks later, May 29, the commissioners, J. L. Naylor, William W. Frazier and W. W. Langdon, met and named the following first county officers of Latah, Idaho territory, and their salaries:

Auditor and recorder, W. E. Kyle, $600 per annum; probate judge, Lewis Jane, $200; treasurer, W. W. Baker, $300; Sheriff, Robert Bruce, $1,200; district attorney, C. B. Reynolds, $600; assessor, L. C. Roberts, 12 per cent of other taxes; surveyor,

S. L. Cambell, no record of salary; school superintendent, John W. Lieualen, $200; coroner, William Gray, no record of salary.

June 14, Robert Bruce, of Deep creek, resigned as sheriff and the board named R. H. Barton of Moscow July 7. Later Lewis Jane resigned as probate judge and Rowland Hodgins was appointed to the vacancy. Both Jane and Hodgins at the time lived in Genesee.

It was of interest that at the first territorial election after the creation of Latah county, of which Dubois was the legislative sponsor, and with him as the republican, James H. Hawly as the democratic and Norman Buck the independent candidates, Dubois received in the new county 341 votes, Hawley 237 and Buck 864. There is an easy explanation, however, of this. With the bitterness engendered between Lewiston and Moscow, and the close proximity of Latah county and Moscow to Washington territory, and with many overtures from Washington folks to join them and cut off from Idaho and with Buck running on a positive annexation platform—pledging himself to attach the north of the Idaho territory to Washington territory—it is quite evident that ingratitude toward Dubois for what he had done in this county division issue was overshadowed by these aims of the votary in the new county. Later in July, 1889, when the delegates met to form a state constitution, the new county of Latah was represented by W. J. McConnell, H. B. Blake, W. D. Robbins and J. W. Brigham, the latter, then, as now living on his farm near Genesee, one of four remaining members of the makers of Idaho's constitution. The other three living members are August M. Sinnott, then of Glenns Ferry, Elmore county, now residing at Oregon City; Frank Harris, then, as now, of Weiser, Washington county, and D. W. Standrod, then of Malad, Oneida county, now residing at Pocatello.

In his Idaho nomenclature, John E. Rees, deceased, has this to say of the meaning of Latah: "Latah, Benevah county. This is a Nez Perce Indian name given to a place near Desmet where in olden times they found some kind of stone out of which they made pestles with which to pound and smash roots. These they called 'Tah-ol' and at the same place were large pine trees called 'La-kah.' By eliminating the last syllable of each word is made 'La-tah' meaning, pine and pestle place.' "

When Rustling Goes "Modern"
By Dorothy Whiteman, Cataldo, Idaho, senior in journalism, University of Idaho.

When rustling goes modern, it puts the "finis" touch to the romantic pages of the history of western pioneer cattlemen.

The West has gradually been "settling down" and becoming conventionalized. The days of those romantic figures in western lore—the lonesome cowboy and the bold, bad, two-gun rustler—have passed over the pages of time into romantic tradition.

Those eventful days when rustlers rode out of the badlands to steal cattle, driving them away on foot to their hidden valleys and blind draws; the days of vigorous action, and of strong, silent men, when a spirited young cowboy would ride over the skyline and lead a band of true and trusty men to the downfall of the rustlers—those days of western romance have slipped into the obscurity of the past.

The action and romance of the frontier; the dreamy mystery of the Southwest and deeds of bravery of strong, virile men, both cowboy and rustler, of the Northwest—the day when men were men's men, and women admired them for it, have gone.

That day has been slow to come, but when rustlers take to importing cattle across state lines in new high speed trucks, with modern gangster methods, the romance of the old cattle ranges has surely gone from the West.
