WAR WORKER SEES POWER POOL AID TO INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

"By interconnecting their lines and pooling their power resources, the federal power projects, municipal electric systems and private electric companies, working together, have done a marvelous job of supplying all the electric power needed for the Northwest's war industries. They have proved that they can serve the people best by working together. This same cooperation of public and private power after the war can mean jobs, prosperity and industrial development. No group need be sacrificed—the advantages of all can be preserved and our American system of free enterprise maintained."
