Having sold the stock and equipment of the Red Cross Pharmacy to Lewis B. (Tom) Keene, I take this opportunity to thank the people of the Kendrick community for their patronage and loyalty during the time I have conducted the business, and bespeak for Mr. Keene a continuity of the same loyal support.

I am now closing my books, and am asking all those knowing themselves to be indebted to me to call and make a settlement.

I can be found during business hours in the room at the rear of the drug store.

Foresight on Main Street

Guesswork has no place in railroading. On the "Main Street of the Northwest," transportation is scientific business, demanding painstaking tests, research and planning applied to vital things, small and large alike.

In this picture, a Northern Pacific test engineer reads, with a microscope, the past, present, and probable future of a pouring of steel. From the sample, he can name the temperature at which it was forged and predict how the metal will perform under practical railroad operating conditions.

Research is helping the Northern Pacific give Main Street fine transportation service.
