Rare Bovill Book Placed In Latah County Libraries

By Kenneth B. Platt
 Some 75 years have passed since an Englishman named Hugh Bovill gave his name to the easternmost town of Latah County. More than 65 years have passed since the large cattle and horse raising enterprise he established there was forced out by the sweep of early Potlatch Lumber Company logging activities. Memories of grand-scale entertainments at the inn he built were stirred but faintly when its long-dusty guest register was rescued from the old building last fall and placed in the Latah County Museum. And little noted at the time was the announcement of a book by Gwendolyn Bovill recalling the founding of the town and the brief Bovill family life there.

Since then the Latah County Historical Society has arranged for sponsors to place copies of this prized book, Knight or Knave?, in each school and community library in the county. A gift of the author from only 100 copies published, the limited supply available was hoarded until all libraries were assured of copies. The few remaining copies can now be bought at the Museum for private ownership.

Although individual letters of appreciation have been sent to all sponsors, The Society wishes publicly to thank them for their generous help. Sponsorships were in the forms of donations to the Publications Fund of the Society, thus helping with preservation of other pioneer history of the county. Donations of $50.00 per library have been made or pledged for each local library. Donations ranging from $100 to $250 have been received to sponsor books for the Museum library and for those of the University of Idaho and Lewis & Clark State College.

A sponsor for a similar donation for the Idaho State Historical Library still is being sought. Several sponsorships have been shared by two or more donors, and the remaining one sought also could be shared. A full listing of sponsorships to date will be published in the July issue of the Historical Society's Quarterly Bulletin.

The Bovill story is uniquely valuable as Latah County history. It is the only first-hand account of the family involved. Only as time has mellowed the rough frontier attitudes common in 1900 has the participation of a British peerage family in our early affairs come to be seen as noteworthy. Hugh Bovill's American contemporaries tended to deal with him rough shod, mistreating his generosity while it lasted and showing no sympathy in his later misfortunes. It was an era when little store was set by family background and cultural tradition. English "remittance men" were familiar on the Western frontier from 1875 on, and the fact that most of them were misfits tended to obscure the virtues of the more substantial few who managed to adapt and establish themselves.

Looking back, we can see that the Bovills were shoddily treated by those who owed them the most. So far as we can find, they were the only ones of their kind to grace the Latah County scene, even temporarily. In the larger sense, they too, were misfits, for though they had learned to cope with the harsh pioneering environments of both western Nebraska and backwoods Idaho, they were too trusting of the niceties of personal decency to cope with timber baron business ethics.

Gwendolyn Bovill was the youngest of the family, and is the sole survivor today.

Her book deals only briefly with the town of Bovill, being concerned more with family affairs. But it is precisely this focus that gives her story its main value for us. We could dig out the history of the town from local sources, but only she could tell us about the family who brought it to life. On that front her story is rich in personal insights and revealing in its assessment of the forces that finally destroyed the idyllic life she knew as a girl.

Equally intriguing is the background of heritage and experience which the elder Bovills brought with them. Hugh and Charlotte Bovill both were products of the British nobility, she from the Plantagenet line that produced Richard the Lionhearted. Grandparents on both sides held high royal commissions. As a younger son among eight brothers, Hugh had to seek his fortune outside the line of inheritance. He had had a go at tea plantations in Ceylon before coming to the American Great Plains in the waning of the open range days. Barbed wire drove his cattle operations to western Nebraska, where he and Charlotte Robinson met and married. There both homesteaded and stayed until increasing settlement once more dictated a move. On an exploratory visit to Idaho, Hugh found Warren Meadows 48 miles east of Moscow in 1900, and there the family came in 1902.

Their new venture prospered. The fine horses they produced were much in demand. Their open-handed hospitality drew lonely timber homesteaders from a wide radius. Government surveyors and private timber cruises came in growing numbers to accommodate the influx Hugh Bovill first opened a small supply store, then an inn to provide meals and lodging.

Up to this point no serious difficulties marred the combined enterprises. But when construction crews building the logging railroad eastward from Potlatch arrived, the genteel atmosphere that had been the Bovill hallmark and the charm of the community soon vanished. In its place came saloons, prostitutes, brawling and other rough aspects. When logging crews arrived, these undesirable were multiplied. And when logging of the surrounding area got into full swing, livestock raising on the interspersed meadows became precarious at best. The final blow was a demand for the Bovill home ranch for use as a log pond and millsite. Advised by his lawyer that it would cost more to defend his land than it was worth, Hugh Bovill took his losses and abandoned his erstwhile paradise.

It is the story by his daughter, Gwendolyn in the opening chapter of her book that makes Knight or Knave? a must volume for Latah County's school and community libraries. Later chapters follow the family fortunes elsewhere, then record Gwendolyn's ill-starred marriage that gives the book its name.

The interest taken by the Historical Society in giving this book its due has brought a most surprising sequel: The author has written and donated to the Society a wholly new book describing the English social background of her parents, and recounting their adventures in pioneering on the Great Plains before coming to Idaho. The Society is studying how best to publish this new contribution to the historic background of Bovill. The title, "A Long Way From Picadilly And a Top Hat," was Hugh Bovill's understated summation of the American western frontier as he lived it. In due time we hope to be able to make this new book available to all.

It takes another woman...

who's been through it... to help the woman who has just had breast surgery for cancer. That's the heart of our Reach to Recovery program.

Once the physician requests this humanitarian service, our volunteer starts helping while the patient is still hospitalized.

The volunteer's appearance and attitude give reassurance of being a "whole" woman. She teaches special exercises. She provides kits with helpful aids to recovery. She answers the many personal questions a woman might not even ask her doctor... or her husband.

If you need the help of the woman who's been through it, ask your doctor to ask us for this service.
