

Verticillium Wilt Spreads To Alfalfa Fields

Marlene Fritz
Assistant Agricultural Editor

Moscow—Verticillium wilt, the most serious disease of alfalfa in Europe, has been found in two new Idaho counties this year, bringing to 10 the number of counties affected.

First noted in the state in 1977, it was identified this September in Twin Falls and Minidoka counties by plant pathologist Bob Romanko of the Southwest Idaho Research and Extension Center at Parma. The disease was previously found attacking alfalfa in Boundary, Kootenai, Nez Perce, Washington, Payette, Canyon, Ada and Owyhee counties. Alfalfa, worth about $200-250 million, is Idaho's third most important crop.

Seed treatment can prevent the introduction of Verticillium wilt into new areas, Romanko said. However, once the fungus becomes established in the soil, only the use of resistant varieties will protect against it.

Although alfalfa seed companies have made resistance to Verticillium wilt a high priority in their breeding programs, new varieties cannot be expected for another year or two, Romanko said and seed treatment is not currently being practiced in Idaho.

The disease survives in plant debris, in infected plants and in the soil. It can be spread by infested seed, hay and mowing equipment by soil movement and by irrigation water.

Crop rotation, less frequent sprinkler irrigation and sanitation of haying equipment aid in its control.

Romanko said that the more intensively alfalfa is grown the more favorable conditions will be for disease spread and yield reduction. However, he said potatoes and certain weeds may maintain the fungus that causes infection even when alfalfa is not being grown.

Until this year, only Idaho, Washington, Oregon and British Columbia were known to have infestations, Romanko said. This year it was also found in a hay field in Wisconsin.

California already requires seed to be treated before importation and Australia has banned alfalfa seed produced in the three Northwest states because of Verticillium wilt. In Canada, where the problem has been severe, all alfalfa seed being imported must be treated for disease control.

The University of Idaho extension has mounted an educational campaign to help growers identify Verticillium wilt. According to Robert L. Foster, a plant pathologist at the U of I Agricultural Research and Extension Center at Kimberly, the disease is difficult to distinguish from others. Damage done by Verticillium wilt may frequently be blamed on other fungi, Foster said.

The disease is easiest to detect just before physiological maturity of the stems, said Romanko. One or a few stems are usually affected first, with one or more leaflets becoming blotchy yellow before drying out. The entire leaflet eventually yellows while the stem remains erect with leaves wilted or fallen. Normal new shoots may develop from the crown, but they soon wilt and die. The disease produces no external symptoms on the roots.

STUDENTS EARN CREDITS, GET PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE

Getting practical on-the-job experience under professional supervision while earning University of Idaho academic credit is the thrust of a program called University Year for Action, which has seven students participating in it this fall assigned to non-profit agencies.

Liz Sullivan, UYA director, said the students are assigned to an agency with openings fitting the student's chosen career field, to work for a semester or a year under professional supervision. During their work experience, they are supervised by UI faculty and earn college credit for the time they spend working and learning.

Most of the students entering the program work with such agencies. Funding for the program was begun with a planning grant from the Federal Action Agency in February of 1975, and was continued by grants from that agency through May of 1980.

Participating agencies also contribute funds to the program. She said that even though federal funding is cut and she has hopes that the action agency may resume funding, participating agencies also contribute funds to the program. She said that the program can continue for management of reserve funds and that she has hopes that the Action Agency may resume funding academic programs or that endowment funds may be found to continue it.

This fall's UYA participants include Michael Dunkle, a senior psychology major and son of Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Dunkle former bio resident now living at Glendale, Ariz., working at the Idaho Health and Welfare Development Center, Mountain Home, helping infants and families of development disabled infants and young children; Augusta McGowan, a senior recreation major and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Vern McGowan, Box 235, Challis, working at the North Idaho Children's Home, Lewiston, and Claudia Morris, a senior recreation major and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Claude Morris, 220 Lakeview Dr., Coeur d'Alene, working for the Moscow Parks and Recreation Department.

Others are Cheryl Holt, senior bacteriology major and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Vergil Holt, 1213 17th St., Lewiston working in the Idaho Health and Welfare Public Health Laboratory, Coeur d'Alene; Krista Kramer, a junior interdisciplinary studies major and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Kramer, 419 rd St., Lewiston, working at the Idaho School for the Deaf and Blind, Gooding; Elaine Natwick, graduate bacteriology student and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Natwick, Rt. 1, Box 216B, Paul, working at the Idaho Health and Welfare Development Center, Idaho Falls, helping the elderly.

Grant May Help Non-Traditional Students Stay in School

MOSCOW—There are perhaps 1,400 students on the University of Idaho campus who are physically handicapped, speak little English or are educationally, economically or culturally disadvantaged and some of them have trouble with their school work.

Helping these students and improving their retention and graduation rates is the aim of a $72,852 grant to UI from the U.S. Department of Education for a project headed by Mary Morris.

"The university has an open admissions policy where anyone with a high school diploma or a Graduate Equivalency Degree (GED) can apply for admission. Therefore, we get students who are educationally under prepared for college and whose English and math skills are very weak," Morris said.

"Our objective is to identify disadvantaged students who have academic potential and to encourage them to complete their college education," she said.

From 0 to 50 students are being tutored under the program currently. By the end of the year Morris estimates the program will have served 270-290 students.

They are enrolled in English and math classes and only five students each, and receive a high degree of individual attention.

"We've attempted to select professors for the program who are concerned with helping nontraditional students and who can give a lot of time and individual attention. Tutors and bilingual counselor are available too," Morris said.

Students can stay in the program as long as they like or can quit when they have passed their courses or feel they no longer need tutoring, she said. The initial grant for the program runs until August, 1981.

Students drop out of college for a variety of reasons, but Morris feels "We want to bridge that feeling of failure before coming to college. We want to bridge that feeling of failure and give the students a feeling of success, to make them feel they are worthwhile and that they can complete college," she said.

The students who enrolled in the program economically disadvantaged she said.

Indexed Fees Would Give Insurance for Wildlife

By Hugh Wilson
Dept. of Fish & Game

The Department of Fish and Game needs to get into the insurance business for Idaho's wildlife resources in the last half of this decade and beyond.

Next January, the department will ask the legislature to give those who use the resources the opportunity to help purchase the insurance.

It's called an indexed fee for hunting and fishing licenses, tags and permits. Such user fees would be tied to a national cost-of-living index and they could be adjusted by the Fish and Game Commission each year to match ups and downs in the rate of inflation.

The result, according to department director Jerry M. Conley, would be the establishment of a sound funding base that would:

1. Ease the impact on hunting & fishing fees that comes when the department must resort to the "catch up" practice of going to the legislature year after year for increases.

2. Allow for relatively modest, but systematic fee adjustments to ensure continuing programs for the benefit of fish and wildlife.

The catch-up process comes about because it takes about 18 months from the time fee increases are approved until they begin to return the first half-year of revenue to the department.

"By then, inflation at a rate of about 9 percent a year passes us by and we must go back to the legislature for another increase," Conley explained.

Using the index and the 1978 year as an example, the price of a resident combination license at that time was $10. By applying the index, the maximum price of the same license would have been $10.75 this year, the director said.

Should indexing be authorized, however, it would be 1984 before the plan would take effect, he added.

The department also is requesting legislative approval in 1981 for the balance of the fee increases that were not allowed in the 1980 session.

"But these increases will allow for little more than maintenance of services at current and barely minimum levels," Conley said.

Savings Taxpayers Money

Nearly $6 million savings has been provided Idaho's property taxpayers during the past year through the joint efforts of the 308 county elected officials' activities in concert with their Idaho Association of Counties (IAC). This represents a return of $50.00 for each $1.00 expended thru IAC during fiscal year 1980, just ended. In addition, a new risk management analysis program initiated this past year has saved each participating county several thousand dollars in their insurance costs. And this service is provided at no added cost to the county requesting evaluation.

The Idaho Association of Counties is designed by county elected officials to provide service, research, uniformity, and cooperation among the member counties to allow conscientious county officials to better serve their taxpaying constituents. IAC is a non-profit corporation whose constitution and by-laws provide a board-of-directors elected by the members. This board, acting in behalf of the members, establishes limits and guidelines on activities of the IAC and determines that accountability be maintained.

"I have asked each department region and bureau to give me a list of needed programs and I emphasized needs, not frill," Conley said.

Department personnel responded with a "virtually limitless group of possibilities," he added. The director listed as some examples:

—Restore the Priest Lake fishery in northern Idaho—cost, $1.4 million.

—Expand statewide big game trapping and transplanting programs—cost, $75,000 a year over 10-15 years.

—Bring backcountry enforcement up to part in north central Idaho—cost $218,000.

—Rebuild cutthroat and brown trout spawning runs in a tributary of the South Fork Snake River in southeastern Idaho—cost, $45,000.

"These and many more programs need doing in the 1980s, but they are only things that could have been until the department has the needed funds," Conley said.

"With indexed fees, specific projects can be outlined and put before the public for approval. That done, work can begin," he promised.

Other major programs and activities the IAC provides for county elected officials are:

Unemployment Insurance available through a cooperative self-funding plan which saves counties approximately $350,000 annually in Idaho;

Education of newly elected officials on their duties, responsibilities and resources;

Personnel policies, guidelines, and recommendations. These are provided at fraction of the full cost.

Cooperative publications such as the 1980 edition of the "Handbook For County Officials in Idaho"; and Analysis of proposed legislation

UNEMPLOYMENT

There has been a decrease in unemployment claims in Latah County this past week, according to Phyllis Dunn, manager of the Moscow Job Service office. There were 26 new claims and 146 continued claims filed this week, compared to 281 total claims filed the previous week. The reduction is attributable to the loggers in the community returning to work after a short lay-off. There continues a demand for a variety of jobs listed in the Moscow office. Examples of some of these jobs are: A licensed electrician; a journeyman auto mechanic experienced in foreign models, several farm machine operators, a legal secretary, as well as sales, motel, and restaurant workers.

The more sand has escaped from the hourglass of our life, the clearer we should see through it.

CANADIAN CONSULATE DONATES BOOK TO UI
MOSCOW—A gift of 108 volumes on Canadian history culture and politics was made to the University of Idaho Library Tuesday by the Canadian Consulate General in Seattle, Wash.

The books, from the Carleton Library Series and Canadian Centenary Series, cover topics including Canadian political unrest, questions on race, statistical accounts, money and banking, the French Canadian outlook and other political and cultural topics. A presentation of the books was made by Vice Consul Glen Groh to Dennis Baird, associate professor and Social Science Librarian. "The gift is a valuable addition to our collection of books on the history and politics of Canada. Our collection has been weak in that area," Baird said.
