Smokey the Bear Changing His Image

Lewiston—When a band of men sets fire to a 2000-acre site on Glover Creek north of the Selway River later this summer, Smokey the Bear may be leaning against a tree cheering.

Has smoke inhalation finally burned out the furry firefighter? Is this venerable symbol of the Forest Service trading in the axe and bucket for a book of matches?

Not exactly, but he is changing his image to keep up with the times. Unplanned fires in our national forests will never sit well with Smokey. They cause incalculable damage to timber resources and cost millions of dollars to put out.

But prescribed burning, a term that refers to the scientific use of fire in forest management, evokes a glow of approval. And elk and deer on the burn site, located in game management unit 16, will second the notion.

According to Steve Weaver, wild life biologist with the Penn Ranger District, forage conditions for big game herds should improve drastically once the flames have passed over the steep, brush-covered area.

"The brush here has matured to the point that it is no longer usable as food by the animals. The burn will remove the old growth and cause regeneration of desirable browse species such as Redstem ceanothus," he said. Redstem is one of the most important winter forage plants for elk and deer.

The last major burn in the area occurred 50 years ago. Weaver said that is too long a time between fires to maintain quality elk habitat.

"Some plants have grown too tall for browsing elk, and undesirable species like brackenfern are outcompeting the important food plants," he said.

Dual objectives of reducing brackenfern and increasing redstem resulted in the August burn date. The high temperatures achieved in a late summer burn are necessary to kill brackenfern. Experience has shown that spring burning with its cooler temperatures can actually stimulate growth of this nuisance plant.

Strangely, the high heat that spells death for brackenfern brings life to redstem. The seeds of this shrub are covered with a hard, tough coat. They may be ungerminated in the soil for years. Only the hot flames of a dry-season burn will crack the seed coat and allow redstem to regenerate abundantly.

The timing of the Glover Creek burn is critical to its success. It is also what makes the operation unique. The Forest Service routinely burns logged areas in spring and late fall to eliminate slash and prepare the soil for replanting. But a late-summer burn expressly to improve wildlife habitat is something new.

"As far as I know, this is the first project of its kind to be undertaken anywhere in the region," said Weaver.

When the 2000-acre prescribed burn was first proposed, there was concern expressed for the safety of wild animals in the area. Sam Mc

Neill, regional wildlife manager with the Idaho Department of Fish and Game, allays these fears:

"For some, a big fire calls to mind images of Bambi and the other animals fleeing from the flames," he said. "The truth is, there are usually more animals in an area after a burn than before."

Probably the best proof of the benefits prescribed burning has for wildlife is the Department's endorsement of the Glover Creek project.

"We've been pushing for this burn for a long time," said McNeill. He noted that much of the elk and deer habitat in the region would be improved by periodic burning every 15 to 20 years.
