snore their way through sleepmuch to the chagrin of their lightsleeping bedpartners Knowing your partner can't help snoring isn't particularily comforting when you've been awakened for the third or fourth time. And, if the snorer is you, mornings might find you wracked with guilt when you see dark circles under your partner's eyes from yet another night of disrupted sleep.

it's no secret that relationships have broken up, in part, over the nightime unpleasantries of snoring. So what's a snorer to do? So what's a snorer to do?

That depends, according to Dr. Eric Pinczower, assistant professor of otolaryngology at University of Washington Medical Center. "If it's just snoring, if it doesn't offend your bedpartner and doesn't progress into other problems." he explained. "I'd other problems," he explained, "I'd have a hard time calling it abnormal." In other words, some people can live with it. But in other cases, treatment may be needed. Obstructions to the airway, such as afloppy tongue soft palate (the roof of the mouth) or uvula (the tissue dangling from the back of the mouth), are the usual culprits of snoring. Obesity, which tends to narrow the airway, is another common cause. And while there are more than 300 devices patented to control snoring—nose clips, chin straps and even a collar that delivers an electric shock, to name a few-most are proven to have little or no effect.

What does work for many snorers is a relatively new and fairly painless surgery called laser-assisted uvulopalatoplasty, or LAUPP, that can typically be performed under a local anesthetic over three or four 15minute outpatient visits.

LAUPP involves two main steps. One is to shorten the uvula by "vaporizing" it with the laser. The other 0 is to tighten the floppy soft palate by making small laser cuts. The body's own healing process draws the soft palate up and tightens it. LUAPP is replacing the standard procedure, requiring an overnight ment is considerably more painful, noted Pinczower, and more difficult 38,086.00 won't stop snoring. Too much can cause a hyper-nasal voice or nasal
